Q1. Read the following passage and complete the given questions below:

The English language is an official or recognized language in more than sixty countries world- wide, from Bhutan to Brunei and Tanzania to Togo. It is also the language with the largest vocabulary in the world, with more than a million words.

To help people cope with this extensive word stock, many dictionaries have been created throughout the ages. This year, a new super dictionary called the bank of English was opened to the public. This in reality is a computer database that contains millions of words from newspapers, books, letters advertisements and even ordinary conversations. The definitions and different uses of every English word has been catalogued and fed in to this computer, making it one of the most valuable of all dictionaries available today.

This large vocabulary is one of the reasons why English dominates the world in the late twentieth century. There are other languages which have spread across the world. French, Spanish and Arabic for example, are used in large areas of the globe. The language with the largest numbers of speakers is Chinese which has a billion speakers compared to the 350 million for English. But there can be a little doubt that English has become the global language of communication.

The dominance of English can be attributed to other social and historical factors too. English was once the mother tongue of the British Empire which straddled a quarter of the globe. It is also the language of the United States, currently the only super power in the world.

English language papers and television stations, have sprung up all over the world, It is so dominant in the world's media that on the first of July 1994, the French passed new laws to stop the flood of English words into their language, Newspapers, broadcasters and advertisers could face jail for breaching these regulations.
